

SCHOONER SANK AT MOUTH OF KILL VON KULL

Unidentified Vessel, Her Crew
Missing, Bars the Passage of Other Ships.

An unidentified schooner sank last night at the mouth of the Kill Von Kull, off the St. George terrace of Staten Island and not far from Robbin's Reef light.

At dawn to-day men on ships at Connetquot, Hook, inside the Kill, saw the two topmasts showing above the surface of the bay, with the mainmast up as far as the tack and flapping. A lot of what looked like wreckage and loose deck gear was washing around, but there was no sign of the crew of the craft or her owners.

Nobody recalled having seen the schooner come to a mooring yesterday or last night. She was merely a mysterious stranger that had apparently slipped quietly into the upper entrance to the Kill and there sprung a leak. Boats were sent out from the steamship dock of Connetquot, the tank steamer J. R. King, "Kestrel" and the schooner Marie Stuyvesant, which are lying at the Standard Oil docks at Bayonne, on the Jersey shore taking on cargo oil. These boats sent the forenoon cruising around the wreck trying to find out something about her.

As the way of the schooner effectively bars the way of all three vessels into the bay and she must be raised or moved before they can get out.
